By TERRENCE O'FLAHERTY

TV's election coverage was characterized by two things—the irritating eagerness of CBS and particularly NBC to display the accuracy of their vote analysis as well as the amusing attempts of TV's predominantly Democratic newsmen (98 per cent is my estimate) to justify Republican victories.

ABC's dour Howard K. Smith invariably blunted the sharp edges of GOP victories by claiming, "Of course, the margin is not as great as Republicans had claimed it would be."

The liberal hour in Congress is over," sighed NBC's David Brinkley. "This means the Great Society will go down to defeat."

The Brooke victory in Massachusetts was a special problem. It was impossible for TV newsmen to discredit his success without seeming to be anti-Negro. It was impossible to congratulate him too much without tossing out the theory of "white backlash" in a state that is 98 per cent white. CBS's Eric Severeid managed best:

"The Peabody family is an old one in the state. They were staunch old abolitionists in the last century. Peabody's mother who is in her 70s, was arrested in Florida recently for picketing a segregated school. . . . You might say that it was families like the Peabody's that made a victory like Brooke's possible. I find something kind of beautiful in this. . . ."

NBC's SPECIAL Report, "The Aviation Revolution" studied the six key problems facing commercial aviation today: air traffic control, crew fatigue, aircraft safety, terminal congestion, noise abatement and supersonic jets. Forty-five minutes of the program were devoted to a backstage examination of a transatlantic TWA passenger flight from Paris to New York, how it is prepared and guided by a network of ground stations as elaborate as those which track the astronauts in orbit.

What appeared at first to be a due-bill travelogue on TWA developed into a substantial briefing on the problems that pilots and crews face today—even before the arrival of the giants of the 70's. A commercial airline pilot commented on the jumbo jets:

"I not only don't want to fly the SST; I don't want to ride in it either."

A ground control executive claimed: "I don't think we are ready for the aviation revolution which is upon us."

NBC's Chet Huntley ended on a cautious note, saying that today's air travelers have not yet reached the limit of their patience, nor have they yet felt confident enough to ask "Who needs to go this fast?"

"But when we are able to kill 1,000 passengers at one stroke . . ." asked Huntley. The program was an eye-opener.

Law in Action

The Topps and the Bottoms were next door neighbors. Each owned large triangular, odd-shaped lots on a hill. The Bottoms' roadway ran between the two lots. For some years the Bottoms had rounded the corner of their roadway to get onto the street easily, thus crossing a part of the Topps' land.

Five years after the Bottoms first began this practice, the Topps built a fence right down their property line making it hard for the Bottoms to turn onto the main highway. Large trucks or cars with trailers could not make it at all.

At first the Bottoms threatened to tear down the fence. Then they sued the Topps and asked the court to declare that the road was theirs to use as of right. They wanted the court to order the Topps to take down the fence.

Nobody doubted that the land belonged to the Topps, the court said, but the Bottoms' use of the Topps' land for more than five years gave them a "right-of-way easement" over it. The court ordered the Topps to take down the fence and let the Bottoms drive over that part of their land.

OTHER PEOPLE can gain rights to your land if they take it or use it, claiming the right against your will. After a time—usually five years—the rights thus taken become permanent.

Landowners should check their land every so often to see that no one is using it or encroaching upon it. They should order the intruder to get off. A property owner can do many other things short of court action. For example, he may ask the unwanted user to stop or charge him a small rental to use the driveway or piece of land. In the end, the landowner may have to go to court.

"Squatters" are persons who know that they are on someone else's land at the owner's grace. They have no "claim of right" and gain no rights to the land because they recognize the owner's rights.

No one can gain rights against government land by using or staying on the land. The government can remove such persons at any time. Of course, government leases or special laws do give such rights to some users.

THERE ARE other kinds of easements such as the right to pasture; to fish; to take minerals, wood, water; to receive light, air or heat; to discharge water to flood another's land or to use a party wall.

Other users may share some of these rights. When the general public shares such a right like fishing or using a roadway, this often becomes a "public easement." The landowner is said to have "dedicated" his land to this public use, whether he does so formally, unintentionally, or willingly.

New Office Program Set At El Camino

A new office training program will be adopted by El Camino College next semester, according to Dr. R. Cline Durfee, dean of business education.

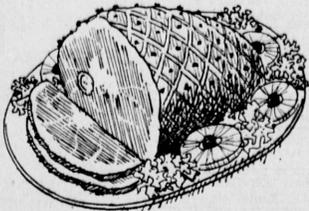

Data processing, ditto, filing, keypunch, and mimeograph will be combined into one class, Business 45.

The two unit course will meet four hours each week and will include technical typewriting and other techniques required in office experience.

Enrollment requires prerequisite typing, 40 words per minute. Day and night classes will be offered.
